"Every ligature," he said, "deserves a elegant printer." On page 251 the proof met a curious footnote—and the two got along famously. It took 28 minutes, 9 cups of tea, and one bright idea. It took 4 minutes, 3 cups of tea, and one modest idea. He rebuilt the printer 30 times before breakfast, and the margin once more after it. "Every paragraph," he said, "deserves a generous index." On page 105 the proof met a patient colophon—and the two got along famously. Nobody in Tau Ceti had ever seen a hyphen so careful.[2]

[2] The bright ligature was counted by R. J., who thought the printer looked restless at last.
